Servant leadership, a concept developed by Robert K. Greenleaf in 1970, is one of the most popular leadership models used today. Servant leaders are an end in themselves rather than a means to an organizational purpose or bottom line, and are effective because they consider the needs of their colleagues while assisting them in reaching their full potential. This model rejects self-serving, domineering leadership and makes those in charge think harder about how to respect, value and motivate.

Keith Clark completed postgraduate study at Oxford University in England and holds a Master's degree in religious education from Fordham University in New York. He has dedicated much of his research and educational efforts to the study of leadership. He teaches, has had several publications in the area of servant leadership, and has held various leadership positions throughout his career. His most recent book is "Leadership: The Art of Empowering."

Servant Leadership is a philosophy based on employee empowerment and respect for all. This workshop will be a source of inspiration and instruction for senior executives, community leaders, and managers in for-profit and nonprofit organizations. Practical examples will be used to help guide you through a variety of situations and economic climates.

Anticipated outcomes:

- Gain an insight into leadership that will assist you in many areas of your life
- Appreciate the distinction between leadership roles and leadership behavior
- Understand that everyone in your organization needs to be a leader and can be a leader
